

DEPARTMENT OF COMMUNICATION

Saint Louis University's Department of Communication offers both a bachelor's and a master's degree.

The 39-credit undergraduate major (Bachelor of Arts in Communication) offers three concentrations: communication studies; integrated strategic communication; and journalism and media studies. The Department of Communication at SLU integrates the study of human communication, media and strategic communication in innovative ways to prepare students for careers in journalism and media, advertising, public relations, and corporate, government and nonprofit settings. In this major, students learn to creatively design, effectively deliver and critically analyze messages to influence, connect and inform, with a particular emphasis on cultural competence and ethical practice. Across concentrations, students develop writing, speaking and digital production skills.

The 30-credit Master of Arts in Communication degree teaches students to be conscientious thinkers and leaders who communicate effectively in a diverse world. Coursework options allow students to deepen their understandings of communication theory and research within a variety of areas of study, including health communication, intercultural communication, interpersonal communication, media studies, organizational communication, rhetoric and public dialogue, and strategic communication. Students learn to ask thoughtful questions and find engaging answers by building the skill sets necessary to develop research protocols, evaluate messages, analyze data and share these findings with various stakeholders. Working with a faculty advisor, students are allowed to develop a personally tailored program of study that fits their individual goals and interests.
